IT STRUCK.

- The thunder boomed, the lightning dashed.

 The rain came pouring down.

 Against the pane the terrents dashed:

 A shower had struck the town.
- And Mr. Brown from soundest sleep Awakened by the din,
- Got up in haste to try to keep The wet from coming in.
- Just as he shut the window down, There came a finsh and crash Together, fit to send the town To one eternal smash.
- And Mr. Brown, quite startled, jumped With nervousness and fright, His head against the sash he bumped-
- Then Mrs. Brown beneath the clothes Lightning she didn't like-
- "Oh, Amos! did it strike!" And Mr. Brown, with aching head In both his clasped hands hid, Swore softly to himself and said: "Well, I should say it did!"

THE TRAPPER'S ESCAPE.

Our story opens at a time when the pioneers of Kentucky were struggling for an existence. At this time there stood a humble log cabin at the edge of a dense wood, in the above named state. It was the home of a person named Richard Wilson, but known to the set-

While he is seated before his fire let us take a glance at him. He well merited the name of "Big Dick." He was over six feet in height, and well built; his brawny arms were the symbols of strength, and when folded across his breast, the muscles stood out like whip cords.

There was a look upon his face which would have impressed the most casual observer; it was something of a calm smile which showed that the pioneer was of a jovial disposition. But that smile did not always illumine his face, for when his anger was aroused, it disappeared like leaves before a tempest.

It is night; the owls are hooting n the grand old woods, but Dick fort or station was a dangerous one, for the treacherous savages had unearthed the hatchet, and with it were carrying death among the wednesday, 5:15 P. "Yes about twenty braves."

"You want me, I suppose?" "Yes, and we mean to have ye, 7w1169 too. If you surrender, we will not kill ye till we get to the villiage."

Anybody with you, Pete?" he said,

"Well now, that's kind-quite an inducement. But I guess I'll go peaceably, and if the chief Ocomo is at the villiage, Pete Redcliffe and his devils dare not harm me," said the trapper to himself. He had scarcely finished this self talk, when the loud voice of the renegade was eard.

"The white Indian commands not Ocomo's warriors; he can speak for himself!" said the chief, drawing himself up proudly, and casting a look of hatred at him who dared to question his authority. The warriors gathered around their chief to hear what he would say to justify his conduct.

"Warriors," he said, "many moons ago Ocomo was hunting in the great woods. He saw a great bear, and fired at it, but his aim was not sure, and the fierce brute was only wounded. Before Ocomo could reload his rifle, the bear was upon him and clasped him in his arms. The scalping knife was drawn and plunged into the bear's side, but it did not kill him. The chief's power failed, and he gave himself to Kai Ja Maniton, and fell down to die But then the crack of a rifle was heard, and the bear fell dead. M. and Mdme. Delaine were French missionaries in Basutoland. Marie, their eldest daughter, had just returned from a two years' sojourn in Paris, where she had been to finish her education.

She had heard all the home news and was inquiring about the natives. when Madame Delaine remarked: "There is one new convert that will please you." "Who is that?" asked Marie. "Old Pitso. He is to receive his first communion to-morrow. Old Before fitting out your table with new dishes, come and look over our converts, but Pitso has been a per-Sana, his wife, was one of our first

Marie duly gave Pitso the soap, accompanied by a strong hint or two, and left him, saying:

"I shall look for you in church to-morrow, and I hope you will look so nice. I shall be quite pleased to see you."

Now, Pitso was very old, and the wool and the thick stubby beard that covered the lower part of his face was perfectly white, or as near white as Pitso's daily habits would permit.

The next morning Marie looked round for her protege among the new communicants. She saw him well to the front with his beady eves shining triumphantly.

Marie gazed at him for a moment in speechless amazement, then, in spite of time and place, had the greatest difficulty to control her laughter. For old Pitso, from his wife's post as laundress of the missionary's family, knew the different processes to be gone through before their washing arrived at the necessary perfection.

So in excess of zeal not only had washed himself, but he had "blued" himself as well. And the effect of "Ricketts' Paris Blue" on his white wool and beard against
